SONG.

[TUNE—A cobler there was and he liv'd in a stall."

I'M a full blooded democrat lately come over,
And now my dear honies I'm living in clover,
A halter and gibbet, I've left do you see,
For a snug little place, in a country that's free,
Derry down, down derry down.

My arrival was honor'd with pointed attention,
By many great Nabobs whose names I'll not mention.
They cordially took your PAT by the hand,
And swore he should live on the fat of the land,
Derry down &c.

I heard their palavre, and soon smelt the rat,
Said I my dear gent's, I'm a rank democrat;
A foe to all government, order and law,
And as for my conscience, 'tis not worth a straw,
Derry down, &c.

Tom Paine's age of reason they bro't for the Bible,
And gave me the book which your Priest's call a libel,
A very good book in domocracy's lore,
And proves to a tittle, the Bible's a bore.
Derry down, &c

So I swore a big oath, to prove true to my trust,
For which I believe I shall one day be curst,
To write libels and lies is my sole occupation,
Damn the friends of good order, and so save the nation.
Derry down, &c.

Your democrats here, are indeed wondrous civil,
Alien law and such stuff they have blown to the devil;
As rich as a nabob, though not worth a groat,
A convict can give for a demo his vote.
Derry down, &c.

Five thousand a year—'tis excellent wages,
For cursing a country, and damning its sages;
Indeed my dear honies, whilst democrats reign,
We'll fill our pockets, says Paddy DUANE.
Derry down, &c

Once WASHINGTON liv'd 'tis well he's no more,
His name was a terror to demos of yore,
But blasted his fame—we now merrily sing,
Huzza! for our Sage, for our new Peacock king.
Derry down, down, derry down.

NEW-JERSEY.

COURIER.

In yesterday's Courier some cursory observations were made on the letter of DOCTOR BAKER to THOMAS PAINE, with a promise to our readers to canvass that letter a little further. We now proceed to the execution of that promise; and if we know our hearts, with as sincere a disposition, and as determined a resolution as a man can entertain, to adhere to strict impartiality and justice, to give praise where praise is due, with candour, to point out the errors into which the Doctor has fallen, and to censure freely without suffering ourselves to set down aught in malice.

On the face of this letter it should seem that the doctor means to go the right road, but is led astray by that will-o-the wisp, party zeal; that he wishes to be a good workman, but unfortunately mistakes his tools; that, to use the words of Major O'FLAHERTY in the play, he intends to fight, but does not know which side he is to be on. That he is a real federal republican, in opinion, and in heart a religious man and a christian, while he advocates, defends, and makes common cause with the enemies, of both; that he abhors that spirit of disorganization, revolution, infidelity and atheism which the monsters of France, with the aid of THOMAS PAINE, have evoked from hell for the ruin of the earth, while he ranges on that side in this country, to which the mal-contents, traitors and seditious fugitives of the world have flocked, and by which they have been received as brethren, offspring of the same glorious cause—the cause of insurrection and rebellion. In a word that the Doctor is a good man, and, at bottom attached to the constitution of his country, while he shakes hands with pure democrats—with men who have little less than proclaimed their dislike of that constitution, and defended those who have strained the influence they possess, from the fair use for which it was bestowed if not to destroy that constitution, at least materially to alter it, for the purpose of making that power permanent in themselves; with those who endeavoured to crush it in the shell, and to kill it when it was a chicken, and yet can now condescend to pick up its eggs and feed upon them; and perhaps (to speak technically to the good Doctor) may at last in a fit of the rabies canna—the morbid voracity of a constitution naturally weak, and stimulated by the acrid gastic juices of ill concocted, unaccustomed repletion, swallow up the whole bird itself, entrails feathers and all.

The Doctor's letter seems to be written from the heart, from the heart in some parts, aiding and reciprocally aided by the understanding; in others, misleading an understanding, which we should suppose not easily misled. Certainly there is an air of sincerity pervades the whole; with all that he has said of TOM PAINE, we must heartily concur, and think that mankind in particular, are largely in his debt for it. And we rejoice to see good men on both sides, joining hands to fling that mischievous man into that obscurity, in which alone he can become innoxious to mankind, or find that last refuge of the wicked, procrastinated repentance.

In times like these, a thousand subordinate errors ought to be overlooked in the person who discloses one inherent master-virtue. To him, who not only by precept, but by open practical example, endeavours to alarm to a sense of their danger a people on the verge of being fatally misguided, to rally them round the standard of Christ, and to rake up the sparks of true religion from the ashes that oppress them, great respect is due: For his noble expressions respecting Mr. PAINE and his principles, therefore, we declare Dr. BAKER has our unfeigned respect, and, we confess it, our gratitude too; and we hope the sentiments which we thus express will not be cheapened in his sight, though we offer a few strictures, with respect indeed, but with freedom also, on the general combination of his letter; and though we say that it astonishes us how a man of such perspicasity as his, could, while there appeared such a correspondence in their conduct, separate the motives of Mr. JEFFERSON from those of Mr. PAINE, so far as to applaud the former, while he justly reprobated the latter.

We are aware that there are many men, good men too, and in other respects, wise, who will ask, what have the religious opinions of any man to do with the people, or the people with them? And not every man exercise his will in a matter which concerns himself alone? Now, without at all meaning to say that civil coercion should wage war with private opinion, we do not scruple to aver, that as opinion is prolific—prolific indeed, too often, exactly in proportion to the malignity and perniciousness of its tendency, mens' exercising bad opinions, does deeply concern the people—first, as it respects the propagation of those opinions, and next, as it concerns the portion of conduct which the individual who exercises those opinions, brings as his share to the common stock of society in which he lives. If a man meets a Lion in the forest, he cannot be sure that he will devour him, though he has just cause to fear it; The animal may, or may not, be hungry. If we deal with an infidel, we cannot be sure, but we have just reason to suspect that he will injure us; The object may, or may not, be equal to the risk, and he may feel that his character would be impaired more than his interest advanced, by hurting us. But the appetite of the one, and the interest of the other, are the only laws or prescriptions on which we have to depend for our safety.

The opinions of any one individual, therefore, are of consequence, more or less, to the society in which he lives; and this consequence increases proportionably with the importance of the person, the station he holds in life, his rank in public estimation, the conspicuity of his actions, the attractiveness of his manners, his popularity; and in a word all those intrinsic qualities, or extrinsic endowments and ornaments which give either splendour or weight to his opinions and render them quick of propogation. In leading men, therefore, opinions are of more subtile, and at the same time, more steady effects than laws. Laws are always slow, often uncertain, in their operation; Notions imbibed from the manners of those about, or above us, are imperceptibly interwoven in the fabric of our minds, and often without the intervention of the will, or the examination of the judgment arrived to the dignity of acknowledged principles, never after to be eradictated or separated from our thoughts; for do we not, alas, every day see things of the most evidently absurd, foolish, wicked, and pernicious nature stalking proudly through life; nay, into our very churches, under the sanction of fashion and custom, while the most obvious truths which religion sanctions, and reason recommends, are thrust out of sight to make way for them?

We never, therefore, can be brought to believe, and we overrate Doctor BAKER very much, if, when he has duly considered it he will believe that even the bare act of the mind; the naked opinion of considerable men; though but obscurely disclosed, are unimportant in society. As sure as the child acquires by imitation the manners of the parent in whose bosom it is bred, so sure will the examples of the higher be imitated by the inferior classes of knowledge; it is no slight matter, therefore, what a great man says or does. It cannot be unproductive. Good or evil, in a greater or less degree, it must produce; and it is for this reason chiefly, (there are other reasons besides) why in the selection of principal men, of national or corporate leaders, or of officers of conspicuity, reference should always be had to the private character of the person proposed, and why, before his talents for the service of men, are inquired into, this question should first be asked and resolved: "Does he serve God."

For fear of being either purposely or otherwise misunderstood, we repeat, that nothing is farther from our minds than the notion that religious opinion ought to be subjected to civil coercion, or the secular arm brought in aid of the management of spiritual concerns. But there is a tribunal of which the world is more afraid, and which seldom fails to accomplish its purposes better than any court of civil law; one paramount in effect to all human tribunals. Vices which could not be feared, have been discountenanced—which could not be made to tremble, have been made to pay the homage of hypocrisy to virtue. The brow of public displeasure is often found more awful than the gaol or the gibbet, and over the guilt of infidelity, would certainly exercise most potent and effective coercion, since nineteen times out of twenty, that vice is rooted in mere weak, shabby vanity, which must soon wither under the blast of public scorn and derision. Let there be no witless admirers or willing deists, and there would be few deists. Let wisdom and piety turn, or rather let it be once considered wisdom and piety to turn with indignant contempt from the presumptuous dogmas (reasonings they are called, God wot!) of proud, petulant atheists, and they would be found to vanish like mist before the sun.

With respect to Mr. Paine, we think that the enormous mischiefs, which his political principles have done in Europe, will in some measure, be counterbalanced by the service he has done to christianity. His Age of Reason will in some sort, atone for his Rights of Man; and, as next to the applause of good men, the hatred of the wicked is the greatest praise, so the hostility of Mr. Paine, and of all men like him, (so far as their talents may go) must be of great advantage to the object of it. Public opinion is now doing its office. Sentence is passed upon that offender, and he can do no more mischief, unless to himself, by infusing the venom intended for others into his own vitals, and, like the Tarantula, stinging himself to death.

But if there should be a person in the union, possessing the same principles, and possessing at the same time more art to conceal, more discretion to manage, and a more just sense of the danger of propagating them. If that person should be of the description I have already given, of rank, quality, conspicuity and popular favour, to make his hint go as far as the word of another; if without incurring the odium of openly preaching, he privately encourages, patronizes, winks at, or even refrains from censuring those who do; if from circumstances, he can carry more wicked disbelief by an inuendo, than another could by pious conviction, by argument, or proof of holy writ, and with a jest make a breach in the bulwarks of our holy faith, which a conclave of Divines would not afterwards be able to repair with a volume of syllogisms; then we ask, is not such a man more justly an object of suspicion and censure to Doctor BAKER, and men who, like the Doctor, are christians; Is he not in reality and effect more dangerous and noxious to a christian society that Mr. THOMAS PAINE ever wa of course ever can be? And would our readers think it an extraordinary maly, an unaccountable phenomeno the human mind, if they should find a man panegyrized by the Doctor, i very letter in which he discloses princ of religion and found policy, so truly nourable to his heart and to his u standing.

PHILADELPHIA. June 9.

Extract of a letter from a respectable house in Lisbon, dated April 26th, to a Merchant in this city.

"The favorable appearance of our Market for Provisions, at the time we wrote you last, has entirely disappeared. The direct Importations from America had begun to affect our Prices, which would probably have declined something more from this cause alone, but they have been completely brought down by the unexpected Importation of a number of Cargoes, of both Flour and wheat from England, and the arrival of several others from different Ports of Spain, both to the north and south, where the markets are equally, and in some of them more overstocked than ours. We note you our present rates: a favorable change in which can only be expected, should the war, which appears more than likely, actually break out. Even then we do not think the effect upon our prices, would be very sudden, as the stock on hand, particularly flour, is great, and the prospect of our coming crop tolerably favorable."

Flour offered at 7 dolls. per bbl. but purchasers will not give more than 6.

Wheat, 1 50 per bushel, little demand.

Indian corn, 80 cents do. If the importations are not too abundant, will probably rise a little.

Pork, 22 to 24		Per bl. small
Beef, 12 15		parcels.

ADDRESS

Of the French Inhabitants of New Orleans, to Laussat, Colonial Prefect, in answer to his proclamation of the 6th Germinal, 11th year.

CITIZEN PREFECT,

France has done justice to our opinion, by believing in the unalterable attachment which we have preserved for her. Thirty four years reign of a foreign power have not weakened in our minds the close love of our native land, and now in returning under her flag, our joy is equal to the sorrow we felt when forced to separate from her. Happy the natives of Louisiana who have lived long enough to be witnesses to this reunion, which they have never ceased to desire, and which is the accomplishment of their dearest wishes. In an age so pregnant with astonishing events, no doubt there have happened things of greater magnitude, more imposing, and more memorable; but nothing perhaps offers so interesting, so moving a scene, as that of victorious and triumphant France holding out her protecting arm to children that had been torn from her breast by weakness and prevarication, and offering to share with them the fruits of a glorious peace, which terminated in so brilliant a manner, the most bloody and most terrible of revolutions. You have signalized, citizen prefect, the return of the French government, by a genuine proof of her benevolent views. Your proclamation of the sixth of this month, by which you announce them, has penetrated us with gratitude for her paternal care. The first favours of the republic are felt, the happy choice of the chief which she places at our head, the honorable reputation of whom has already reached us; the chosen troops which she sends to guard our homes, are certain presages of the happiness and prosperity she is preparing for us. We offer to her in return our submission, our obedience, and our love; and we swear to prove ourselves deserving her name. She would probably place less value on the homage of our fidelity, if she saw us leave, without any symptoms of sorrow, the sovereign who has loaded us with favours, during the time he has reigned over us.

That culpable indifference does not exist in our hearts; the regret of losing him occupies a place with the joy of returning to our native country; and it is by retaining an eternal remembrance of his goodness, that we mean to shew ourselves worthy of the favours and attachment of the French Republic.

New Orleans, the —— Germinal, 11th year.

(Signed by a number of the principal inhabitants.)

AN ADRESS.

From a number of Federal Gentlemen, of the District of Salisbury, to

ARCHIBALD HENDERSON Esq.

To the Hon ARCHIBALD HENDERSON, late Representative of the district composed of the counties of Rowan, Iredell, Mecklenburg, Cabarrus and Montgomery, in the Congress of the United States—

To a patriot, the most grateful reward is the approbation of his constituents; we think it our duty as your constituents, thus to reward you. Your virtuous and dignified exertions for the respectability and happiness of our country, and for the support of irs inestimable constitution, make that duty agreeable to us, while it is but justice to you.

We therefore, in the plain undisguised language of freeemen, declare that your conduct during the four years which you have devoted to our service in the supreme legislature, commands our unlimited approbation: and for ourselves and our common country, we sincerely lament that the more imediatele forcible private obligations to your family, should deprive us and it of the future benefit of your talents and virtues at this eventful period—we congratulate you on the confidence which those virtues and talents have established in the minds of the wise and the good—and cordially with you that uninterrupted peace and happiness in your retirement, which dignified virtue merits.

THE ANSWER.

With you, gentlemen, I think that the most grateful reward which can be offered to a representative, is the approbation of his constituents. It is not necessary to add, that I receive this testimonial of your approbation of my political conduct, with the most heartfelt pleasure.

The four years which I have had the honor to serve you in the supreme councils of the nation, will form a memorable epoch in the history of American affairs.

During this preriod, the andministration of the government passed from those, who by their efforts, and their struggles, their care and energy, their wisdom and their perseverance, gave character and credit to the nation at home and abroad, into the hands of those who were not unfriendly to our constitution, but had carriod on unceasing hostility to all the great measures adopted and pursued by their predecessors in power. I am free to declare that in my opinion the policy which now directs the government will eventuate neither in its interest, honor or dignity. Impressed with this belief, I have thought it my duty to oppose it, and cannot but feel myself happy in meeting your concurrence.

Nothing which has been done by the present rulers, excited so much alarm as the act to repeal the judicial establishment. It was not believed that a majority of congress, whether from design or error, would have lent their aid to a palpable violation of the national compact in that article which of all others is the most essential to the efficiency and stability of government, to the security of property, to the safety and liberty of persons. When it was found that this breach was seriously contemplated, the federalists thought it their duty to make a stand to save the constitution, the victory of the majority was complete, and they have triumphed over the liberty of the people; for I seriously believe, that, if the construction is to prevail, there is no political liberty in the U. States.

I pray you, gentlemen, to accept my sincere acknowledgements, for this your friendly attention, and be assured I reciprocate your wishes for peace and happiness.

A. HENDERSON.

Salisbury May 20, 1803.

While war is expected in Europe, the friends of mankind are enquiring into the means of preserving life with the greatest comfort, and in the full length of it.—"Sir John Sinclair," says the excellent Medical Repository, of New York, "in his Essay on Longevity, wishes the following questions to have an extensive circulation, and invites all persons, as far as their experience and observation will admit, to answer them with minuteness and accuracy:

1. What is the effect of the climate in which you reside, on the health and longevity of the human race?

2. What form is reckoned most conducive to health and longevity?

3. Is it found, that being descended from young and from healthy parents, is essential for good health and old age?

4. Is it found, that health and old age depend much on the disposition or temper of the individual?

5. Is there any perceptable difference in consequence of situation in life?

6. What professions are reckoned favorable to longevity, or otherwise?

7. Are exercise and moderate labour found necessary for preserving health and long life?

8. Have the long lived, in general, been in the married state?

9. Has the greatest proportion of the long lived consisted of males or females?

10. Have there been any instances of persons renewing their age, getting new teeth, new hair, &c.

11. What are the other circumstances tending to promote long life?

12. What is the effect of diet on health and longevity?

13. What are the effects of cloathing?

14. What the effect of habitation, and difference of living in town or country?

15. What are the effects of habits and customs, in regard to early rising, bathing, regular meals, regular sleep; and, in particular, what are those minute circumstances on which it is supposed that health and longevity principally depend?

16. What are the rules regarding medicine which are accounted the most useful and salutary?

17. What are the most remarkable instances of longevity, and how are they authenticated?

18. What are the rules adopted by those who have attained great age?

19. Have any tables of longevity been drawn up in your neighbourhood, and do they agree, &c.

20. Do any additional observations or particulars occur to you on the subject of health and longevity?"

These are not questions of mere curiosity. The love of life will determine every man, at some time of his life, to make some observations on them all. It will not then be less important to answer these questions, when proposed by a great man, than to one's self in the enquiry after happiness. Nor is a large portion of this useful knowledge difficult to obtain. If many, when asked to report for future records, may seem to disown any knowledge of this kind, yet in familiar life and conversation, no man is willing to be thought an entire stranger to these questions or their answers. To record these opinions and facts, will render them more sure for our own use, and of more certain benefit to mankind.

Cure for the bite of a mad dog, or sting of any poisonous serpent.

Cover the wound with fresh earth or snuff to imbibe the saliva of the animal, and then wash it with water; at the same time warm half a pound of butter in four times as much vinegar, and when the wound is cleansed, apply a compress, of linnen steeped, in the above mixture, and moisten it very often for nine days, after which you may remove the compress, and cure the wound in the usual way. During the time the vinegar is used externally, it must be used internally, by taking it in doses of an ounce and a half wormed with a little fresh butter four times each day. The patient's common drink must be water for at least 15 days, or water with vinegar or juice of citron. He must abstain from the use of ardent spirits or exercise to prevent irritability.
